Celebrating Women's History Month - March 2025

Sarah and Daniel Carter, and their daughter Mary Lavina, became Alpena's first permanent settlers in November of 1856. Daniel and his business partners were drawn to the area for the plentiful virgin white pine that would make a profitable lumber trade, with the Thunder Bay River the perfect spot to build a sawmill.

Shortly after he and his family created a homestead, others followed, eager to harvest the bountiful wild forest. It wasn't long before the Carter's tiny modest house near the Thunder Bay River became the first boarding house, as there was nowhere else for visitors who were scoping out the land to stay.

The Carter home was often filled to capacity with visitors, but Sarah Carter was an excellent host and managed to provide a nice bed and plenty of food for their guests. There was a small clearing and plenty of food for their guests. There was a small clearing around the Carter home where they grew a garden, but the rest of the area was covered with swamp, trees and thick brush. You can find more of the story online for Alpena's first family with this link:
